As more and more states approve medical marijuana and a few have approved recreational marijuana, there are more people who are learning to grow. More people are starting to grow AutoFlowers indoors. AutoFlowers get their name from the fact that you don't alter lighting schedules to force them to flower. Many people are gravitating towards AutoFlowers because they can be easier to grow. You can keep all of your plants together, including the ones that are in vegetative and the ones that are in flowering. Auto flowers tend to be smaller than their Indica and Sativa counterparts, so they can grow in smaller spaces. You don't have to transplant them, crop or top them, or clone them. AutoFlowers are a unique type of cannabis. The rules for growing AutoFlowers are quite different in many instances than the rules for growing a Sativa or Indica strain. Growing AutoFlowers covers everything you need to know from the types of parts you need to use two types of lighting needed to how much fertilizer and when. It tells you how to supplement with CO2, how to generate your own seeds, how to calculate your lighting needs and how to setup your grow room space. Decent!

By Ulises Ramirez-Roche

It's alright. There's some stuff that isn't really needed like varying the light cycle. Autos like your regular photo is a c3 plant so there's no need to muck around with anything. Keep em at 24/0 or 20/4.
